Around the country, issues around housing affordability, demand for more housing choices, and neighborhood compatibility are growing. Cities are in desperate need of solutions, and Missing Middle Housing, as one tool providing solutions, is catching on like wildfire. The mismatch between current US housing stock and shifting demographics, combined with the growing demand for walkable urban living has been defined by recent research and publications. Missing Middle Housing is not just a theoretical concept, and every day we're seeing more and more evidence of this. Unfortunately, the solution is not as simple as adding more multifamily housing stock using the dated types of housing that we have been building. It's time to rethink and evolve, reinvent and renew.

Dan Parolek is principal of Opticos Design, an architecture and urban design firm with a passion for vibrant, sustainable, walkable urban places. Join us for this insightful discussion focusing on Missing Middle Housing: Responding to the Demand for Walkable Urban Living.
